Ten Vessels Flying U. S. Flag
Among the 55 Now Crossing the Atlantic.

Skippers of the incoming fleet of twenty-seven liners shown on the chart to-day are ambitious to land their third-class passengers, probably the immigrants at this port before the quota for November is filled, and it is certain that some ships, from the Mediterranean particularly, may do a little racing. There are six steamships from Italy bound this way, including the Canopic (P-204) of the White Star Line and the Dante Alighieri (Q-52) of the Navigazione Generale Italiana Company.

Ten ships flying the American flag are shown among the total of fifty-five at sea, and there would have been eleven if the Red Star liner Kroonland had not dropped her port propeller in heavy weather, with about 400 miles out of Sandy Hook last night, and returned to port for repairs. She will get away again on November 12. Her passengers are aboard the Lapland (D-31), one of a squadron which sailed yesterday.

The showing of the American ships is more than great, and the United States Shipping Board, through its Bureau of Planning, is planning to make it better in the immediate future. There is talk of withdrawing from the London service vessels of the type of the Panhandle State (K-1) and the Centennial State (O-2) and replacing them with larger, faster and more commodious passenger carriers. One of the first to be replaced is the United States Lines has asked for larger and swifter ships so that they may make a bid for the patronage of passengers that now patronize the older lines.

The largest ships now crossing the ocean are the White Star liner Olympic (G-18), off the Banks, and both the way with a big list of distinguished voyagers; the Cunarder Aquitania (N-5), nearing Cherbourg, with 960
